Well, it got your attention!

A recent attempt in Parliament to make the practise illegal was stopped in its tracks by one MP shouting 'Object!' at the right (or possibly wrong?) moment. Cue cries of outrage and a furious online 'debate' about well, almost anything.

There was an attempt at a reasoned response in a comment piece in my paper entitled 'Stopping upskirting needs more than a law.'

The writer, Hugo Rifkind, wondered 'why we needed a law to make men ...'. Well, in this specific instance it is about the behaviour of some men: but more generally; 'there are two problems here, and only one of them is that people are getting away with it. The other is that they want to.'

I think he was heading in the right direction but he didn't come to any real conclusion other than a desire to find a way to shame men into stopping such behaviour, rather in the way in which the law was used to shame people into not drinking and driving. That obviously worked to a certain extent but equally obviously there are still a hard core of drivers who think they can get away with it.

Again: 'there are two problems here, and only one of them is that people are getting away with it. The other is that they want to.'

Passing a law has benefits but in reality it is only papering over cracks. The reason any particular law is there is because it has been decided that a particular activity is wrong. And passing a law against that activity only says that it is deemed to be wrong. It can do nothing about a desire to behave in such a way. An MP in a later debate said: 'If you don't deal with the root cause, you won't stop it.'

Absolutely. The problem is that another piece of legislation, no matter how well-meant or well-crafted is never going to deal with the root cause, which is that inner drive that pushes us into doing things 'because I think I can get away with it.'

Upbringing and social convention may go some way towards helping but they cannot deal with that inner motivation. For that something far deeper and fundamental is needed.

The apostle Paul reminds us that as the Lord's people we are a 'new creation'. That fulfils an ancient promise that God will take from his people an old heart of stone and give them a heart of flesh.

These are metaphors. A heart of stone is one that does things 'because I think I can get away with it.'

A heart of flesh is one that seeks only the well-being of others.

It's a gift.

Thanks.

Many thanks to everyone for cards, gifts and good wishes on our marriage in May.

We had a wonderful wedding and enjoyed two days with family and friends.

David & Kath Wood

and Changes.

Following that I have now left the Vicarage and live in Penrith.

My email address remains the same, as does my landline number, at least until the end of September.

David

and Help Needed.

The last edition of Grapevine under my editorship will be the October issue (produced at the end of September).

If anyone would like to take on the work, which is not onerous, please have a word with me in the next few weeks. It doesn't have to remain in its present format so there is an opportunity for some creativity. You never know, it might be start of a career in journalism!
